RECORDS OF CRIMINAL HISTORY DESTROYED.—In addition to the great losses by the Chicago conflagration, Allan Pinkerton, the famous thief catcher, sustains a loss which to him cannot be replaced by dollars and cents. Thousands of thieves and hundreds of thousands of respectable people were as fully acquainted with the name of Allan Pinkerton as of the name of Thomas Jefferson or Jack the Giant Killer, and his detective agency was as famous an institution as Boston Common. The system over which he presided was the result of years of patient toil and persevering energy, and the reputation enjoyed by him was the fruit of that toil and energy and perseverance. With a huge central office in Chicago, and branches in New York and Philadelphia, the champion thief catcher had his prey so unaccountably situated as to be all the time in the tools only they did not know it. Mr. Pinkerton started his detective agency in Chicago in 1852, and two years later, when it began to assume large proportions, the records were commenced. The most minute details of every case were faithfully recorded.

The amount of matter thus created was astonishing. For the mere clerical work upon it more than $50,000 had been paid. Of such enormous records there were no less than four hundred gigantic volumes of great value. These were nearly all stored away in six of Harris' largest safes, while the remainder were placed in wooden cases. It is needless to state that every one of them was destroyed.

Mr. Pinkerton also possessed complete records of the secret service of the Army of the Potomac. They were of immense value, being not only the complete, but the only set in existence. Mr. Pinkerton, whose facilities for obtaining correct information during those days were of course very much greater than any one else could boast, valued them at $250,000. The Government had already offered $30,000 for them—thirty-nine volumes altogether—and negotiations were still going on. The whole set perished.

Pinkerton had in his employ a large number of preventive policemen, whose occupation was to watch while all the city's sleeping, to chase the rogues that prowled by night, as the two sons of armies were wont to sing. These men had orders every night to make out a report when they came in. They had to give an account of their proceedings on their beat, the condition of the weather, what unusual circumstances they witnessed, who they saw, and what they said or did to him or her. These reports were all copied into the records. There were forty of these ponderous volumes, which were obtained at a cost of $40 each. Their value may be imagined. They were frequently consulted in court proceedings for the purpose of gaining information as regards the weather, the condition of the streets, the presence or absence of the moon, and other policemen. There were in all forty-eight patrolmen, who gave each an account of these particulars, and it is presumable that their accounts generally coincided so far as atmospheric conditions were concerned. Of course the records were all destroyed.

In a small room adjoining Mr. Pinkerton's private office were a number of plain wooden cases in which were stored the files of the daily papers since 1854. There was not a copy of a daily or weekly paper issued since 1854, of which Mr. Pinkerton had not a duplicate. Many were bound together, and in volumes covered them all. There were printed instructions posted all around the walls, giving directions to the men in case of fire, to move these portable records in time, trusting the safes to protect the records. Owing to some misconstruction in the building one safe, containing some of the account books and receipts from express companies of money restored, fell into the street, and escaped being melted. The contents were valuable in their way, but to Mr. Pinkerton only. The other records were completely wiped out, and with them was wiped out the foundation for a complete and exhaustive history of the Northwest, besides matter enough for thrilling stories without end, ground-work for sensational stories innumerable. It was Mr. Pinkerton's intention to have some of the published in due time, when the parties were dead or forgotten. Indeed, many of them were already written, and were waiting but a favorable opportunity for introduction to the world.

Besides these losses were other paraphernalia of a detective were stored: the dormitory and the extensive household arrangements necessary for the accommodation of the small army of men in constant employ in the building also were burned.

HOW CRIPED WAS SAVED.—The Chicago Post relates in the following manner how Criped was saved from the recent conflagration: "Porter Palmer's residence having been on the boulevard, many invaluable treasures of art escaped the ruin which fell upon his magnificent buildings. Mr. Horner, with whom, during Mr. Palmer's absence at the East, Mr. Palmer was residing, was not so fortunate. He, however, saved many valuable things, among them a costly piece of sculpture brought from Rome. It was a beautiful figure, a Cupid, or something of that sort, and was mounted on a pedestal so heavy that it could not be easily moved. Mrs. Palmer threw the figure upon a bed, covering it with the clothes. Among the people crowding about the rumor ran that a sick boy was in the bed, and four strong fellows, who they knew that it was Cupid that occupied the place, would certainly have left him to a fate worse than he had ever imposed upon others, took up the bed tenderly and bore the unconscious lad from the danger which threatened him.
